The Internet and social media offer a wide range of distractions to keep you from your work. Social media also offer the promise of fame and fortune if you don't have to much writing talent or skill. Everyone and his brother wants to be an author these days. Most people make the mistake of writing their novel and expecting it to sell. No one has ever won a million-dollar lottery, with an exception for the airlines. Hopefully this post will help you avoid that mistake. Does your novel have a beginning, middle, and end? It does. It's actually rather rare for anyone to write a novel without a beginning, middle, and end. It's rare enough that one of our writers noted that in the first book of her crime series she has an end scene that is a direct reference to one from her previous book. It's also a good idea to write three different endings. The end you choose will depend on your plot. Are your characters names consistent throughout the novel? It's important that you use the same name for your main characters no matter where they appear in your book. Call your protagonist James when he's on the first page, but Jim when he's being a junior high bully, and Jimmy when he's backpacking through France. Don't use a character's name with a different meaning just because you've already used the character as another name. If you decide to use a nickname for your main character, do it consistently. Can your story be summarized in just three words? Possibly. If you've got the facts about your characters, use that. Try to focus on the three most important items: the protagonist, the antagonist, and the conflict. Outline your novel using three to five sentences. Have you read the entire novel before you write? This is a writer's best friend. Before you write your first page, look at your manuscript and see if there's any scene that
