Keyword Tag Generator Software Reviewed by Techupgraders on April 25, 2018 Rating: 5Q: Can I use the same output pin for the Amp in current test and DUT measurement? I have a test bench that I use for testing audio amplifiers. In the bench there is a 10K resistor, a 0.3uF capacitor, and a series of long parallel wires (about 1m). The wires connect the amplifier with the 0.3uF capacitor, the 10K resistor, and then to my scope. I use the scope to do frequency sweeps to find the crossover frequency at which the amplifier starts getting saturated and/or distorted, or at which it starts making hum. My question is: can I use the same output pin for the amp which is connected to the scope, as well as for doing the current measurement on the amp and input DUT? The reason I ask this question, is that in a DUT measurement, you need to measure the current into the DUT. This requires 2 pins (Tungsten probe + no load), whereas in the testbench you need only one pin (output) to do the test. A: There is no reason why not. They are measuring different quantities, but it is fine to share the same input pin. One way to ensure the signal level isn't too high is to connect the scope in series with a 1k resistive divider.
