Browser : This refers to the program you use to view photos on your computer. Photoshop supports two different types of browsers: • The default view uses a browser window that displays all the layers in a specific image. This is usually the most useful view of a single image, but a browser window is not capable of displaying multiple images at once. You must open each image separately. • In the Layers panel, Photoshop opens images using an embedded browser window. You can display two different images at once. This is the simplest way to display multiple images. Color Settings : A combination of settings for your monitor, camera, or printer are often referred to as your "color settings." You must either enter these settings when you're printing a file or click the Printer Properties button and enter them there. For most home printers, you enter the settings in the Hardware tab of the Printer Properties dialog box. Figure 14-3 shows the Printer Properties dialog box in a Canon camera, with the Settings tab displayed. You can also use the Color Settings button at the bottom of the Layers panel, which opens a color-level-related dialog box (described shortly). Many different adjustment tools, including the Red, Green, and Blue (RGB) level, are available in this dialog box. You find it next to the Curves and Levels dialog box. Figure 14-3: The Color Settings dialog box in the Printer Properties dialog box. Levels, Curves, and Clarity : Although Photoshop makes it easy to change an image's overall exposure, contrast, and color, you may need to tweak specific areas of an image to improve it. Levels, Curves, and Clarity let you adjust the pixels in an image either globally or in a specific area, such as a certain part of the image or a single layer. Levels To have Photoshop change the overall brightness and exposure, you select the Levels tool, displayed in the Layers panel (Figure 14-4), and use it. The background behind the Levels dialog box is brightened to show you the effect of adjusting the other settings. The Layers panel (which displays all the current layers) contains a number of bright buttons. Choose the Brightness/Contrast tab to make changes. Figure 14-4: You can adjust the overall brightness and contrast of your image by selecting the Levels button. Curves

Q: Overloaded methods within the default scope in C# I read that in C#, the default scope can be accessed by calling the member directly, as you would with a local variable. I also read that you cannot overload functions within the default scope. So, if I have an overloaded set of method calls, then if I do this... class MyClass { void test() { Console.WriteLine("This works"); } void test2() { Console.WriteLine("This works as well"); } public void Test3() { test(); test2(); } } ...I would expect the following output to be printed to the console: This works This works However, I'm getting the following, and I don't understand why: This works This works I've tried this with multiple other overloaded methods, and it always seems to output: This works A: Why it doesn't work It seems the main source of confusion lies with the different scopes for different types: While the member variables within a class are scoped just the containing class, member variables within the instance of a class are scoped across the whole instance: The code: class Program { public static void Main() { var foo = new Foo(); foo.Bar(); Console.ReadKey(); } } class Foo { public int Bar { get; set; } public string Baz { get; set; } public static void Bar() { // This is not visible here // It is only visible for the "this" of foo Console.WriteLine(Bar); } } The output: 0 Program.Main: Bar Program.Main: Bar Why the "This works"

Q: How to use of underscore with jsoup Android? I'm trying to make a search box in my app using jsoup. The search box list every item in my database. I tried to find the element id (which have the text that I want) but it's not working. I also want to make it that when I have found the id element it will automatically change to the next item. For example when I typed Paris the element id would change to London to search further. Can anyone help me? This is the div that I want to change when I type something in the input and I already have the id element. A: Working example: var searchBox = document.querySelector('.metro-search'); searchBox.addEventListener('keyup', function() { var selected = document.querySelector('.singleresult'); var id = selected.getAttribute('id'); var html = selected.innerHTML; var site = document.querySelector('#site'); var elements = site.querySelectorAll('a'); elements = Array.prototype.slice.call(elements); for (var i = 0; i
